The game found its way into several casinos but the game was essentially flawed in its gameplay. It suffered from the same thing that ancient Roman dice games suffered from centuries ago. Players would fix the dice to tip the edge in their favor. It was only in the early 1930's that a solution to this problem was found. John H Winn introduced the Don't Pass wager with his right and wrong bet rules. This corrected the problem and the game has not experienced any major changes since then. Many tourists to ACT come to see one of the largest natural parks in Australia. The city of Canberra makes up less than half of the land in Australian Capital Territory; the rest is made up of the large Namadgi National Park. This mountainous and heavily-forested area takes up more of ACT's territorial space than Canberra itself. The most obvious feature of the park is its many granite mountains, part of the Australian Alps, though the space is actually very diverse in terms of both landscapes and wildlife. Mountains, alpine forests, and grassy plains make Namadgi a natural home for animals like kangaroos, wallabies, wombats, and a long list of birds. The water captured from Namadgi National Park supplies ACT and Canberra with as much as 85% of their water supply.
